

MASS & CLASS LITIGATION DEVELOPMENTS IN EUROPE – SHALL COMPANIES TREMBLE AND CONSUMERS REJOICE?

It was all over the news on 9 May 2018: The German government plans to enact a law that would give certain qualified institutions the right to raise claims for declaratory judgments on behalf of groups of consumers. Other European countries have either already enacted similar laws or are planning to do so. The European Commission has recently presented its proposal to amend the current legislation in this regard in order to strengthen the position of consumers affected by the wrongdoing of large companies. How will the measures taken by the EU Member States and the Commission change the litigation landscape?

Already under the current legal framework, groups of consumers have raised group claims e.g. against VW in Germany and Facebook in Austria. In the UK, a class action has been filed against Mastercard.

The panelists are:

- Dr. Fabian Reuschle
Judge at Landgericht Stuttgart and “Vater des KapMuG”
- Ottmar Lell
Teamleader Law and Trade at Verbraucherzentrale
Bundesverband e.V.
- Dr. Christoph A. Baus
Partner, Litigation & Trial Department,
Latham & Watkins, Hamburg
- Dennis Horeman

Amsterdam

Moderators: Heiko Heppner, J.D. (KU) (Dentons)
and Jan K. Schäfer (King & Spalding)

Are the measures proposed by the German government and the European Commission a good idea? Will they help consumers and companies receive justice? Or will they create the feared “US-style class actions”, which are expressly to be avoided?

The litigation think tank ILEX would like to discuss these questions with you in a mixed German/English-language panel discussion on the occasion of its annual conference on:
